Kols have neither mud walls nor wooden doors. When they leave the house, a bit of thorny brush is put in front of the doorway. This will keep out dogs and also any dangerous spirit which may be seeking admission. 342

When the building of a house is completed, there is usually a dedicatory ceremony consisting of installing and worshipping the household god or goddess or both, and a small niche in a corner or in the side wall is reserved for this purpose. The place is marked with sendur and the hom sacrifice is made. An offering of a chicken or young goat may also be made at the village shrine. A tulasi plant should also be planted somewhere in the courtyard. 342 776 778

DAILY LIFE. The daily life of the village and forest Kol centres mainly about the problem of daily bread. Before daybreak the women are up and are the first to be seen about the village. They sweep the house, the veranda and the courtyard; fetch water from a nearby stream, well or tank and grind the wheat for the morning meal. The sound of the grindstone is one of the earliest to be heard in a Kol village. The men are also up early, but do not have much to do in the way of household duties unless it is to chop a bit of wood. They wash their faces and rinse out their mouths with water which the women have brought, and, if they have bullocks, these are fed and got ready for the work in the fields; or if this is not to be done, they sit around in the sun in the courtyard and wait for some hot tea, or more probably for rice and chapati remaining from the meal of the night before. During the season when the work is heavy, they are in the field not long after the day has dawned, and the village is inhabited only by the women, children and older men. The bullocks for ploughing are driven before them; some of the older boys may assist in this, and the men carry the iron-pointed wooden plough. If some of the men-folk have no work in the fields, they may go into the forest for wood and grass; or, if there is plenty of food in the house and there is no pressing need for money, they sit around in groups and smoke cheap country cigarettes (biris) and gossip. 512 [252] [515] [264] [492] [407] [276 521]

In the meantime the women are preparing the morning meal. It is not usual for men and women to eat together. The women and children usually eat about the same time, though when the boys get in their teens, they like to eat with the men. During the middle of the morning, after the meal is nearly ready the women go for their daily bath to a nearby stream or tank. Women bathe every day throughout the year. The men bathe daily in the hot weather, but not so frequently in winter. The women do not remove their clothes when they bathe, though men usually remove all but a loincloth. The women [264] [515]

512 stand in the stream up to their hips with their saris still draped around
515 them, and if there is a possibility of men in the vicinity, also cover their heads. Water is poured over them or they may immerse themselves. Ordinarily no soap is used, in fact the use of soap is not common to village people, though it is not unknown. After the bath the women come to the shore and by first draping a fresh sari about them slip off the wet one without exposing themselves. They do not dry themselves with any towel, though the hair may be rubbed dry with some 512 cloth. Oil is sometimes applied to the body. They next wash the [296] sari they have removed, which is done by beating it with a stick on a flat stone. After being wrung out it is taken home to be hung up somewhere about the house to dry and be ready for use the next day. The sari put on at the time of the morning bath is constantly worn until the next bath. The bather may now take a bit to eat, or oc-
[264] casionally she may have her morning meal, though it is more usual for her to wait until the men have been fed or she takes what is left. The husband usually returns from work about mid-day and gets his meal; but if the work is heavy and he must be there, she will take it out to the fields to him, where he will eat it and, after a short rest, [184] resume his work. If the work is pressing, she may remain to assist [241] him, though she should never touch the plough. She may reap, weed, and thresh, and she carries home the rice and wheat which has been threshed. During the hotter months field work begins before daylight, and the men are back by ten o'clock. In the threshing season the work continues steadily throughout the day, for that is the [515] time when the hot winds are active and the chaff is easily separated. The men may bathe on their way back at noon, or in the evening before [264] their evening meal. If they return from the fields at dusk, the evening meal is usually not taken till after eight o'clock. Unless there is some [513] social event such as preparations for a wedding or a tribal feast, or, perhaps a religious ceremony, the Kols are asleep by about nine at [527] night. On religious and social occasions, however, the whole night may be spent in singing, watching the women dance and chatting. The social events occur usually in the slack season and work is not interfered with; but under industrial conditions there is a limit to night operations, and the singing is usually over by midnight.

[857] The children have their tasks too. The boys, as soon as they are old enough, herd cattle and goats in the forest, gather sticks, leaves and roots, and run errands for their mothers. The girls assist their mothers in the home, gather cow-dung for use as fuel and as plaster for the walls and floor.

The main variations of this routine are occasioned by social that the child is a girl and let him alone, for it is boys that they really try to get hold of.

Hair from the first cutting should never be thoughtlessly thrown out on the ground. The best thing to do is to wrap it in a small piece of cloth and take it to the Nerbudda River where it is thrown in as an offering. No special trip to the river is required and the hair may be kept in the house until some convenient season or until some friend or relative happens to be going that way. The belief that magic may be worked with hair is prevalent in India, but Kols do not seem to fear this danger, nor do they believe that another may work harm by possessing it.

First Feeding: Passi. Most Kols attach considerable importance to the child's first feeding with solid food. This should be done when the child is about six months old. One group said that the feeding should be done at five months in the case of a girl and six months for a boy. This indicates Hindu influences.

The family invites as many of the child's relatives as they can afford to feed for a general feast following the ceremony. The child is to be fed with sweetened khir—rice boiled in milk—which has been specially prepared for this occasion. A portion of khir is placed in a small cup made from the leaves of the mango tree (Mangifera indica). As the ceremony begins, the friends and relatives wash their hands with water specially brought for them; the child's teeth, if in, are cleaned by being lightly brushed with a mango twig. The person who breaks the child's "fast", and this may be one of a number of relatives, among whom we find mentioned the name of the father, mother and father's sister (phuphu), first dips the index finger of the right hand into the khir and brings a portion up to the child's mouth but does not actually touch its lips, for the finger is immediately withdrawn. This movement is made six times, but on the seventh occasion the finger is put into the child's mouth and with it a bit of the khir is inserted. Others present follow in the same way until all have fed the infant. Each one who thus feeds the child is supposed to drop into a dish beside it some money, the amount varying according to circumstances: it ought not to be less than four pice and may be as much as eight annas. The money thus collected is used to buy silver bangles for the child.

Sometimes the child is fed with a silver coin rather than by the plain finger. This may be an influence of Hinduism. One group said the silver coin must be either a four or eight anna piece. The coin used is dipped into the khir and the baby fed on the seventh approach as in the above description. The phuphu receives the coins by which portions are then made for the bridegroom to eat lahahaur, the food prepared especially for the occasion. This may be of several types. It is sometimes said to consist of rice, pulse, puris and bara; and again of milk, rice and sugar. This is brought by a female member of the family, the sarhaj (bride's brother's wife) being preferred. Before the boy is asked to eat the lahahaur two women dressed in dancing garments make their appearance; they sing and dance and are accompanied by some men with their drums. This party advances towards the jaumasa singing songs which contain many questionable allusions and are considered as gali (abuse). They carry the emptied hatsa with the lighted lamp still on top of it, and place it before the boy who is asked to go around it seven times and sit down. When he has done this the sarhaj tries to make him eat the lahahaur; she brings it up to his mouth five times in her right hand and after smelling it as many times he refuses to eat. She is paid four annas for this by the boy's father. There is more singing and the giving of gali by both sides. Finally the sarhaj brings a lota of water and washes the feet of the members of the boy's party and at the same time openly counts them so that they may know how many will need food. Much of this food has already been cooked but it is not served till midnight or later. In the meantime, during the meal, and even for the rest of the night, there are songs and the dadra dance.

About eleven o'clock the next morning the members of the bridegroom's party take their morning meal at the bride's house, but the groom stays by himself in the jaumasa where his food is brought to him. When the others arrive their feet are washed as before and each member is given a lota of water so that he may wash his hands. The male members of the two parties always eat together first and the meal is usually served on leaf-plates, or, if they are available, brass ones. The men then go for a chat and rest and sometime later the women take their food. At no time do the men and women eat together.

(b) Sadi. The Actual Ceremony. The evening of the second day sees the performance of the marriage proper, the sadi. The premises of the girl's house are again plastered and all made clean and ready. The Brahmin priest who wrote the lagan is expected to arrive after nightfall. If the family should decide to dispense with his services the part of the priest may be taken by the phupha (father's sister's husband). The priest first marks out a square, called the chauk, on the plastered portion of the courtyard not far from the wedding booth, using whole wheat flour to mark the lines. A kalsa is then placed at its centre into which will be thrown the gifts for the

the ashes are thrown is called the Kharighat and the ceremony described as khari thanda karna—"the cooling of the ashes."

THE RETURN TO THE DWELLING PLACE. Whether the body has been buried or burned, the return from that place to the house is essentially the same. The party moves off one by one after encircling the spot, but presently the men linger and group themselves together, and the women do likewise in another group in the rear. Having once completed the round of the grave or cremation place, they should not look backwards lest the movement be interpreted by the spirit as an invitation to come along; or lest they be attacked. The women bring back with them any of the sweets that remained after placing them along the pathway as they went toward the funeral place, also some of the water left after washing the body. The sweets are cast into the tank or river in which they bathe, and the water is kept till they reach the house after the ceremonial bath, when a bit of it may be mixed with haldi and scattered on the chief mourner or others, and the rest used to put out any fires in the house.

Bathing. The ceremonial bath should be taken in a tank or a stream, and if necessary a detour is made to include one in their return trip. If neither is available water from a well may be used, but the actual bathing must be at some distance from the well and the water should be drawn by some one who was not at the burial ground. Whether the bath is taken at a tank or stream, the men should bathe first. The bathers should line up and if possible should all go under the water together. After being submerged once or twice they step back to the bank and proceed home in their wet clothes. The women then bathe following much the same procedure, and go home in wet clothes. Reaching there fresh water must be used to wash their feet and now they may enter the house.

Cleaning the House. During the next few hours after the return home there is much to do. All clothes have to be changed and the dirty ones washed, preferably by a Hindu dhobi. All the pots and vessels made of earthenware must be thrown out upon the refuse pile. Sometimes they are broken and at other times are set out and the Domar or Basor comes and takes them away. The floors and walls of the house have to be plastered and thoroughly cleaned. The chief male mourner must have his head and face shaved, but a little tuft of hair, the sacred scalp lock or chutiya, is generally left. Usually a Hindu nai is called in for this, although the work may also be done say there is nothing one does in relation to it. The moon is thought of as feminine and the sun as masculine, for the moon is cold and the sun is hot. There are a number of beliefs and superstitions concerning the moon. It is good luck to see the new moon before any stars are out in the sky. On seeing the new moon for the first time a Kol may either tear a corner off one of his garments and cast it toward the moon, or may hold up the garment toward the moon, saying: "Take these old clothes and give me new ones." It is usual at the same time to take worn-out pieces of cloth or just rags, and hang them on the tree near the house. This attracts the goddess of torn clothes, Chithra devi, who will bring good luck and in the course of time new garments.

The moon is thought to have no evil influences upon men folk and therefore is not feared by them. Women, however, are likely to be affected by the moon and as far as possible should avoid it. Pregnant women especially should not expose themselves to the moon as it is liable to cause a miscarriage or a deformed infant.

The time of an eclipse of either the sun or the moon is a time of special precaution and worship. The Kols say that the sun is devoured by a giant whom they call Dhrubh. The concept that a demon devours the sun is common all over India, but the usual Hindu concept is that it is swallowed by one named Rahu, the "looser or seizer." The Kol story goes that both the sun and the moon at one time borrowed something from Dhrubh, whom Kols call the brother of Indra. This debt must be repaid, and if at any time the sun or the moon is not able to pay on the debt, it is attacked by Dhrubh who begins to devour it. He never quite does so, however and vomits it up, as there is still money owing and payments must go on. Others say that Dhrubh is merely jealous of the moon because she is worshipped and adored while he is not. Therefore he attacks either the sun or the moon. One should bathe at the time of an eclipse. During such a time women should remain inside for it is a very dangerous season especially if they are with child. The men may go out to bathe, sing and beat the drums. Wicked spirits are abroad, and unless the women are protected by charms, they are liable to be attacked. After the release of the sun or moon, the women go out to bathe. The Nerbudda is the best place in Central India, but any tank or river will do if one cannot go so far. After bathing they should give some alms to Basors who will be waiting near by. They give to no others.

At home no food is prepared or eaten during the eclipse. Nothing cooked is left in the house, and all uncooked food should be carefully protected so as not to become a prey to the evil spirits. All the earthen vessels used in connection with food and water should be thrown out
